PSYCHOANALYTIC ACTS: EFFECTS ON THE REAL

In 2012 the Australian Centre for Psychoanalysis will turn its attention to studying the place of psychoanalysis in our times, its clinical and political effects. We know from our collective clinical experience that psychoanalysis impacts upon the real of the symptom, the real of the organism, and the possibility of social bonds. Nevertheless it is necessary for us to continue posing questions about how we achieve these effects and demonstrate the efficacy of the work we undertake as psychoanalysts. These questions build on our previous year's research into the aim of analysis, understood as the production of a new relation with the symptom, a know-how [savior-faire] with jouissance.

Lacan uses the term Psychoanalytic Act to refer to the moment of passage from analysand to analyst and insists that this is not a matter of conferring, but rather a transformation orientated by désêtre [dis-being]. Lacan invented "The Pass" as the mechanism through which an analysand could give testimony to the work of analysis and those charged with listening to this testimony can bear witness to the effect produced by an analysis. Is this the only way of verifying the effects of our work as psychoanalysts? How can we consider the relationship between these experiences, the end of analysis, the moment of The Pass, and the experience of the passage from analysand to analyst? These questions are central to the ethics of a Lacanian School and will be studied from various angles throughout the year.

ORIENTATION TO THE YEAR'S WORK

On Saturday, February 12 an orientation to the year's work on the aims and ends of analysis will be held for members and students of the ACP.
